Investment Review and Outlook

Market Review

December saw positive returns across the emerging market (EM) debt asset class. In hard currency debt, this was driven by a US Treasury rally, rather than EM spread performance which was negative. The US 10-year Treasury yield, which had been increasing for most of 2018, fell to 2.68%, which was not far from the end of January 2018 level of 2.72%. The oil price continued to decline despite OPEC announcing production cuts, with Brent crude falling to US$53.80 per barrel at the end of the month. Despite growing risks for the global economy and a more pessimistic view on US growth, the Fed proceeded to hike interest rates at the last meeting of 2018. However, importantly, it did signal more caution around its policy outlook.

Over the month, the JP Morgan EMBI Global Diversified Index returned 1.35%, while the benchmark spread widened by 20 basis points (bps) to 415 bps over US Treasuries, which was the widest level since March 2016. The positive return from US Treasuries outweighed the negative credit performance, resulting in the market's positive overall return. By credit quality, investment grade bonds outperformed high yield assets by 60bps on average during the period. Among the best performing assets in December was Turkey, which was supported by macroeconomic adjustments in its current account and inflation level. Lebanon also performed well with news of a potential break-through in government formation talks surprising markets. On the other hand, Oman was the worst performer over the month. It lost its Investment Grade status from Fitch (a rating agency) owing to fiscal rigidities and delays in implementing VAT and excise taxes, which could see the fiscal deficit rising to 10% of GDP in 2020.

Activity

December was a relatively quiet month for activity. However we added exposure to Gabon – the sharp decline in oil prices in recent months has inevitably weighed on the oil dependent country's sovereign bonds, but this has improved valuations. In addition, with the help of IMF program guidance, which saw a further disbursement of US$99 million in December, the prospects for reforms and fiscal prudence seem to be relatively good at present. Over the month, we also further increased our overweight in Papua New Guinea, where we think the relatively high yield offered more than compensates for associated risks. Other purchases included the sovereign bonds of Namibia and Paraguay.

Performance

Our EM sovereign external debt strategy returned 0.85%, underperforming the JP Morgan EMBI Global Diversified Index by 49bps. The single biggest detractor was the Fund's underweight in the Philippines (- 10bps), with negative contributions also from being underweight in China (-8bps) and Russia (-8bps). On the positive side, the leading relative return contributor was off-benchmark exposure to Qatar (+8bps), followed by an underweight in Oman (+7bps) and an overweight in Indonesia (+7bps).

Outlook

The overall backdrop for emerging markets appears to be improving. Despite raising interest rates again in December, the US Federal Reserve (Fed) signalled a more cautious tone regarding US growth and the path of policy tightening. At the same time, China has slowly begun implementing its stimulus agenda. Heading into 2019, increased uncertainty around Fed interest rate hikes is likely to weigh on the US dollar, boding well for emerging market currencies. Moreover, large economic adjustments in major emerging markets such as Argentina and Turkey suggests that these markets will start the year on a much better footing compared to last year. Coupled with more attractive valuations compared to other risk assets, all these factors suggest the makings of a possible positive turn in sentiment towards emerging markets. Some notable key risks do remain however, including the US-China trade dispute and upcoming elections in Argentina, Indonesia, India and South Africa.
